Protecting KEEPING NATIVE CULTURE AND LANGUAGE ALIVE AND GROWING

Seven generations from now, when nobody knows my name...I think there is a real chance that our language and ceremonies will be alive in the hearts and minds of our future generations. And that will be the greatest accomplishment and legacy.

One of the newest First Nations' Luce Indigenous Knowledge Fellows, Anton Treuer (Ojibwe), is committed to sharing his knowledge to ensure that Ojibwe lifeways are forever protected. Through the fellowship, Anton is advancing his self-created apprenticeship, in which he personally mentors community members of all ages in the Ojibwe language and in many cultural and spiritual traditions, such as drum ceremonies, medicine dances, and tobacco offerings. An author and professor, and one of the few remaining Ojibwe language speakers in the country, he is guided by one of his elders who told him early on: "If you learn something – a word, a song, a ceremony, anything – make sure you teach it to at least four other people."

Protecting Preserving Prevailing

Since 1980, First Nations has invested in the lifeways and economies of Native communities

Preserving INVESTING IN THE FUTURE OF OUR SOIL, LAND, AND WATER

Leiloni Begaye | Diné
Senior Program Officer,
Stewarding Native Lands,
First Nations

All trainings are focused where our feet are grounded in Nahasdzaán, and we honor all relatives from clanship to our four-legged relatives, winged-relatives, and water.

Navajo and Pueblo tribal nations have always called the Southwest "home," stewarding beautiful, vast landscapes with diverse ecosystems that constantly interact in kinship through the soil, water, plants, animals, birds, and tiniest of organisms.

First Nations serves over 167 Native American land stewards throughout their ancestral homelands, sharing knowledge and skills inherent in conservation planning – inventory mapping, ecological site composition, soil analysis, rangeland management, and more. Trainers meet up close and personal with Native farmers and ranchers, addressing challenges revealed in the field, from drought and fencing, to irrigation, wildlife, and permits. Also provided is hands-on experience in planning for ecological, economic, and community goals. What makes these trainings stand out is that land stewards themselves are part of the process, engaged in the future of their lands and their home.

Prevailing BUILDING A MOVEMENT FOR NATIVE AMERICAN JUSTICE

INVISIBLE NO MORE

VOICES FROM NATIVE AMERICA
EDITED BY RAYMOND FOXWORTH AND STEVE DUBB

This collection of essays of era a new narrative—one grounded in Native history and Native values. It is one that gives Native people and Native practitioners visibility, and one that suggests a strong call to action.

President and CEO
First Nations

First Nations is leading research and advocacy in line with a broader, national discussion about racial equity. As part of this work, we collaborated with Nonprofit Quarterly to share voices from Native American leaders about what Native justice, both environmental and economic, means to their communities. The groundbreaking collection of stories, Invisible No More: Voices from Native America, highlights the resilience of Native people and their fight to maintain their distinct identities, protect land and the environment, and advance tribal sovereignty.

Also, through this justice movement, Native artists like Jackie Fawn (Washoe, Yurok) are contributing their artistic gifts, recognizing that art should be at the forefront of any movement for change. Jackie's illustration (right) depicts "justice for our ancestors, as we are still here, honoring our roots so the next generation won't have to make the difficult strides we do as parents and relatives."
